I send out a few emails a month for a small group of people and I generally don't have anything useful in my email other than links to their latest posts or press releases. Therefore, I'd like to have a tool which can track when they open and how long they spend on them. What would be a good tool for this? A: I'm not aware of any tool which can do this, but it wouldn't be hard to code a solution yourself. The most difficult part will be getting the time-to-open and time-to-view stats from the email. The two are not always directly related and may vary greatly depending on the recipients' email clients and the mail server. If you're working with Microsoft Exchange, the time-to-send statistics are available directly through the Exchange Management Shell using 570a42141b
