All of them face federal charges for their alleged involvement in a prison drug and gambling ring that brought in $36.5 million. Of those, most were taken into custody on Thursday and Friday. But more arrests are expected. The court documents describe a group that operated from two adjoining concrete-walled jail units at the Metropolitan Detention Center (MDC) in Brooklyn — a place infamous for its dungeons and abuse — as well as inside the facility's infirmary. It was described as "an ongoing enterprise" that allegedly abused the trust and submitted the names of more than 80 prisoners to the federal government to receive illicit favors and discounts in exchange for their voting "slate" of four members to the leadership body at the facility. "These elected members become leaders on the street who control who in the prison can be released," said the indictment. The "leaders" have also coerced other inmates to accept daily fentanyl deliveries and pay for sex with inmates, according to the court papers.Q: Bash script to run from cron I have a bash script that I would like to run from cron, and I have managed to get it to run fine as a service. It is the following: #!/bin/bash echo "starting cron..." # finds the last modified by date of a zip file in a directory zipFile="123.zip" zipFilePath="/path" zipLastModified=$(find $zipFilePath -type f -printf "%a+") if [$zipLastModified -lt 2 hours

I cannot understand this source (w3schools) that says: The technique of employing the powers of context-free grammars to parse non-regular languages is an elegant and powerful approach. However, this technique introduces a fundamental problem: the search phase of the algorithm can grow exponentially as the input size of the string grows. Does it mean that if I want to parse some strings whose size is smaller than the size of the alphabet of my context-free grammar? And also, why do we need look-ahead? Does it mean the grammar cannot use the new result of a previous parsing step (at some edge)? And finally, why not just use a linear-time algorithm that use the fact that our language is context-free and that the DFAs are decidable. A: Yes, it means that the length of the input string does not have to be smaller than the size of the alphabet of the grammar, since the algorithm has to store the results of all previous steps. A look-ahead will tell the automaton how many symbols have to be inserted into the input string to make that input valid. So an look-ahead of 0 means that the input string will be accepted from the very beginning, and look-ahead of 1 means that 1 symbol has to be inserted after the current symbol. An look-ahead of 2 means that 2 symbols have to be inserted and so on. An example of a grammar for a language that does not need look-ahead is the grammar for the language of strings over the empty alphabet consisting of ϵ that start with ϵ 570a42141b
