The UC Berkeley Graduate School has launched a new initiative that will provide students who are interested in writing with training to help them apply to graduate programs. The support that comes with graduate school is often cited as a top reason why people choose to pursue a graduate degree at the university, according to Scott Case, the Berkeley Graduate School's dean. But students can also struggle with writing, he says. Case envisions this support system as a sort of standardized curriculum that will bring graduate admissions advisors, academic advisors and writers together to train students on topics such as writing for academic purposes and improving their writing skills, whether the students are writing dissertations or graduate school applications. The goal of the partnership is to bring Berkeley's renowned expertise in teaching writing to its students, and to develop stronger and more connected graduate students, he says. "It is so daunting to go and write your dissertation and then have to do a lot of writing in graduate school. And
