Risks of gastroenteritis in a managed care population. Understanding the risks of gastroenteritis is of great importance to practicing physicians. Although the causative pathogens responsible for most cases of gastroenteritis have been determined, not all risk factors associated with these illnesses are clear. We analyzed data from a health maintenance organization to identify risk factors associated with gastroenteritis in a managed care population. To determine the incidence, the prevalence, and the types of gastroenteritis, and the costs of hospitalizations, emergency department visits, and outpatient visits. Patients with physician claims for gastroenteritis were selected from all members of HealthFirst HealthCare, a health maintenance organization. The study patients were compared with patients with physician claims for influenza, a common cause of gastroenteritis, who were selected from all members of HealthFirst HealthCare. Multivariate analyses were performed to identify risk factors for gastroenteritis. The date of an episode was chosen to determine the time to onset of illness. A logistic regression model was used to determine the influence of a set of demographic, preventive care, and health status variables. All analyses were adjusted for the repeated nature of the outcome and for case-mix factors. The overall incidence of gastroenteritis was 7.8 per 100 person-years. The incidence rates for gastroenteritis were highest among children aged 2 to 4 years and the elderly. Physicians' office visits accounted for more than half the outpatient visits, and more than two-thirds of the emergency department visits. The economic burden of illness was substantial. The risk of gastroenteritis is highest among the very young and the elderly. Preventive measures including vaccination and supportive care of certain subgroups should be administered according to age and risk groups.Q: What are the different source files that are required for developing with Xcode?
