In today's construction methods, a screw (including, for example, a bolt, a wood screw, a railroad spike, a mechanical screw, or any other anchor, for example) is typically installed at a first location on the construction project, bent or trimmed to its desired final length at that location, and then attached to the intended load-bearing structure at the second (distal) location. This is quite labor-intensive, particularly in areas where there is limited access (for example, on roofs) or where a long straight section of construction is needed (such as in exterior or interior wall construction), where a more rigidly attached load-bearing structure is needed (such as a wall), and/or where the joist or studs with the screw holes cannot be bent or trimmed too freely (for example, on unpainted metal). If an excessive number of screws are needed, there may be insufficient space available or the structural integrity of the construction project might be compromised. [Vibratory characteristics of muscles undergoing neurogenic atrophy]. The properties of rectus femoris (RF) muscles from rats with artificially produced muscle edema due to unspecific lesions of motoneurons were studied during the contractile exercises at frequency of 8, 14 and 20 Hz. The muscles were found to contract slightly stronger than the intact controls at frequency of 20 Hz. However, the muscles became gradually unable to contract with higher intensity. The function of motoneurons slowly regressed within 2--3 weeks after the injury. In the presence of myogenic and mixed response, the myogenic component prevailed in most cases. Cannabis has had a transformative effect, from ending alcohol addiction to creating better parents. In recent years, there's been growing recognition that it could be an effective treatment for PTSD, as well as epilepsy and MS. While there's no cure for these conditions, according to the National Institute of Health, anecdotal case studies are beginning to show promising results. Scientific publications over the past five years cited the role of cannabinoid receptors in the body to treat mood disorders and epilepsy, but since 2011
