The rewarding properties of the stimulant drug amphetamine (0.032-0.64 mg/kg per injection) and the suppressive effects of apomorphine (0.02 mg/kg per injection) on amphetamine self-administration were assessed in female Sprague-Dawley rats using a "placebo-controlled" drug regimen in which the rats were given the choice between drug-paired and drug-free periods of variable lengths. The data indicate that amphetamine is self-administered in the female rat. It is suggested that this finding, together with the fact that the mechanisms underlying amphetamine self-administration in the female rat have been previously only partially characterized, calls for further study of the rewarding properties of this stimulant drug in this species.[Neuroendocrine tumors of the stomach: an update on diagnosis and therapy]. The neuroendocrine tumors (NETs) of the stomach are a well-recognized heterogeneous group of tumors with a low incidence and an extremely variable prognosis. Although the majority of these tumors are well-differentiated, some tumors are poorly differentiated and may be aggressive, with a metastatic potential that is much greater than that of a normal functioning carcinoid. The correct diagnosis of these tumors is important because of their different biological behavior and, therefore, for clinical management. Most of the NETs are initially confined to the stomach wall, but some can metastasize to regional lymph nodes and liver. In general, NETs of the State-of-the-art electro-optical imaging technology has developed rapidly in the past several years with the advent of new laser sources and novel detector/image processing techniques. The unique properties of these new imaging devices make them particularly desirable for a wide range of modern sensing and instrumentation applications. These include such diverse fields as remote sensing, structure/shape measurement, optical fiber sensing, laser material processing, biomedical, and surface analysis. One of the most common configurations of an imaging device is comprised of a linear array of detector elements. Each detector element in the array is capable of detecting a distinct image pixel. These elements may be designed to detect and convert the photons of a single wavelength into electrons which are then collected and coupled to amplifiers and analog-to-digital converters. In that case, the linear array of elements may be considered a linear "detector array." In another configuration, the image may be formed by an array of elements that are capable of detecting, storing, and processing the output of a series of laser spots. In this case, the linear array of elements may be considered a linear "imaging array." In many of these imaging arrays, the imaging elements are arranged in a planar fashion such that the array is rectangular in shape. In such case the array is commonly referred to as a "narrow-field" imaging array. Such arrays are particularly useful for many types of remote sensing applications, for example, for obtaining high resolution, panoramic images of a scene from a remote location. These narrow-field imaging arrays also may be used to measure the shape and position of structures or objects, both animate and inanimate. Other types of imaging arrays use an imaging array of elements that are capable of detecting and processing the output of multiple beam sources. These are commonly referred to as "wide-field" imaging arrays. Examples of wide field imaging arrays include an array of pixels, each of which is capable of receiving light from a particular part of a scene. Multiple fields of view may be obtained by moving the imaging array (or a mount that holds the array) to different positions. The imaging array may also be rotated to obtain multiple fields of
