Strategy for Underdog You are probably one of many, who have faced underdogs in tournaments during their climb up the standings. Many players consider them for half of a match. But, shouldn't you learn to take a different approach? To beat underdogs, you need to add a couple of ingredients to your game. First you need to make a difference against them, and you can do it by playing decent tournament chess. Second, you can earn some points against them just by taking a different view. Underdogs are difficult to beat if your sight is confined to the fighting pieces on the board and the pawns marching toward their promotion squares. That's where the so-called "long-term objective" comes into play. It's a more balanced thinking, and more thoughts change position along with time. It can lead to an advantage even before you go "out" to attack it. To get there, we have to look a little bit into the concept of Counter Gambit. It's a term coming from military strategy, but it's also the first thing you need to watch out. From the latter point of view you don't need to have a cannon in your hand to play a chess part. In fact, it starts with a pawn, and it depends on your technical and strategic thinking to find the right moment to make the first strike against it. For example, when do you take advantage of the opponent's weakness? Study their Playstyle What is their playstyle, how can you relate it to you? Are they more aggressive and careless than you? Are they more like pawns, or king hunters? Do they build up a structure first? Remember that the special thing about losing time in chess is that the tempo has an impact on some features. A lazy player, for example, is more likely to put all his attention to "resources management". Power in chess often is bluffing - and that's what you have to be aware of at least. A rook without a pawn on the long diagonal is no help How to Relate to Your Counter What you can watch for in the opposition is: What openings they play? Are they symmetrical or balanced? Are they proactive or reactive? What distances do they create before their pieces venture out? Where they create
