ResidentEvilRevelationsNudeRachel The company said in a letter to Amazon on Monday that “we believe that the review process, the need for disclosure, and the allowance of bias to impact search results make its use against an individual or a business questionable at best, and even against our corporate interests.” A BUSY, STIMULATING, LEISURELY FESTIVE and even slightly frightening week was capped off by a festival that turns into a rave when it’s all over. This festival was one of those events that you would never have heard of if you were doing the round of private schools in the area. It’s a very intimate concert in the grounds of a large private Catholic college which takes place in the morning. But come the afternoon, all of a sudden you’re being serenaded by a horde of disgruntled, rowdy, inebriated teenagers, all in the name of music. And this year, things were especially hectic. There was a real sense of unrest amongst the crowd which you don't see here much. After the first two or three songs the atmosphere was electric, the music crackled and the crowd went wild. The sound was a bit muddy and the PA was loud, but that didn't stop the majority of these young, good-looking, well-mannered and well-behaved youths from letting their hair down. They jumped up and down, clasped their hands together, closed their eyes and mouthed the lyrics to every song. To be fair, they didn't go beyond what was expected of them – they didn't start throwing bottles, chanting or singing anything that would have been considered a disturbance – and they were extremely good sports about the whole thing. But it was still quite extraordinary seeing this normally harmonious crowd go off the rails. Indeed, one of the highlights of the festival was when someone in the crowd started going off on the stage and causing a small disturbance. The other band members just sat back, looked at him and
