Anthropometric, clinical and developmental data on children with cryptorchidism were collected to assess, if cryptorchidism, in and of itself, is associated with a subtle, subclinical delay in neurodevelopment. A group of 105 cryptorchid boys and 24 boys with inguinal hernia were matched for age, race and social class. Anthropometric measurements included weight, length and head circumference. Motor and mental development scores were obtained for all children. The mean age of the total population of children ($M = 3.8$ years) was not different from that in the inguinal hernia group ($M = 3.8$ years). In the cryptorchid group, mean head circumference was consistently smaller than the hernia group throughout the age range studied. When individual anthropometric measurements and head circumference were compared between groups, significant differences were found in weight and length for age and weight for length. When clinical and developmental scores were compared in the two groups, significant differences were found in the cognitive/language tests. There was a significant negative correlation between head circumference and age in the cryptorchid group only. These data indicate that cryptorchidism is not associated with a developmental delay in the majority of cases, and that the presence of cryptorchidism, in and of itself, does not have a deleterious effect on the development of children. Advocacy-driven expansion of public health measures in the 1990s: the case of prenatal care. The rapid expansion of health care coverage in the United States during the 1990s is often portrayed as an unprecedented achievement in achieving universal access to health care, the "end of welfare" and a new "Age of Austerity." Yet from a historical perspective, the current wave of health care reform is merely the latest stage in a decades-long revolution that began in the early 1970s as the United States shifted its economic and social foundations away from a once expansive Welfare State toward a minimalistic safety net. This essay argues that the "Age of Austerity" has been joined by an "Age of Advocacy," a moment when the scale of the US public health establishment has finally grown large enough to support unprecedented policy interventions. The recent emergence of "public health advocacy" as a

Fidel Castro and his brother Raul pictured in the 1970s The elder Castro died over the weekend at the age of 90 after falling ill during a family vacation in the southern Andean city of Santa Clara. "A few hours ago Fidel Castro Ruz died," his nephew said. "Fidel Castro Ruz has been battling a long fight; a long battle, a long time," the leader of Cuba's Communist party said. "He got older, he was ill - there's nothing strange in that." Castro was considered one of the most important figures of the 20th century, although he rarely appeared in public since he took over in 1959. In April 2008, he disappeared from public view for four months, and flew to Havana for surgery for an undisclosed illness. "Fidel Castro Ruz was responsible for all the Cuban revolution," current Cuban leader Raul Castro was quoted as saying. "He led the revolution, he fought for the revolution... he is a legendary figure in the history of mankind." The very public announcement of Castro's death came only after his brother had initially declined to comment on the fact. Cuba's communist state media chief Manuel Marrero said Castro died in the early hours of Monday in the southern coastal city of Santa Clara at 1:40am local time (18:40 GMT Sunday). Although no official cause of death was announced, a family spokesman said Castro had been suffering from advanced stomach cancer. The ageing leader has been hospitalised since early November for an unspecified illness, but the precise nature of his condition has not been disclosed. Fidel's death comes only days after Cuba and the United States last month opened formal talks on ending a half-century-old Cold War enmity. For decades, the two countries' relations have been at a standstill because of the United States' hard-line stance toward communist-run Cuba. Castro was a towering leader of Cuba's 1954-1959 revolution that ended with his brother Fidel becoming 6d1f23a050
