in a post to their respective github repositories, the researchers, manoharan ravichandran and vinod appanna, described the vulnerabilities as follows: "shellshock is a general-purpose vulnerability that can be triggered in userland and which allows a malicious application to take over the process of another vulnerable application. the attacker provides specially crafted options to the vulnerable application to take over the process executing the vulnerable application. due to certain limitations in the design of the operating system, the userland component is highly prone to exploitation and can be used to cause privilege escalation, arbitrary code execution and possibly information disclosure in the application hosting the shell. the main technical aspect of the vulnerability is the fact that the '$path' environment variable is not properly escaped when used as shell argument in a command. we have detected this vulnerability in more than a thousand software packages as listed on the wazuh security team feeds. we have also reproduced the vulnerability in our own software, such as our tripwire monitoring product which we are currently using to report a ticket. we are monitoring the upstream development of bash and will update this post accordingly with any necessary updates." .. the vulnerability is so similar to heartbleed in some ways. like heartbleed, the vulnerability resides in the heart of the operating system, and the fix requires all of the software to be updated. like heartbleed, shellshock's impact is so wide and far-reaching that it will change the way that users think about the security of the internet. however, there's more good news than bad news. unlike heartbleed, shellshock is a limited vulnerability, the scope of which isn't nearly as wide as heartbleed.
